ASSET ALLOCATION

Market volatility remains elevated as high inflation and rising interest rates are bringing down global growth expectations. China’s zero-COVID policy has also driven a more significant reduction in growth forecasts for the world’s second-largest economy. For equities, we believe market levels will be higher at the end of the year and prefer value-oriented companies, sectors, and markets. We also maintain our preference for commodities. With higher yields, bonds are starting to add some diversification to portfolios again.

BALANCED USD MODEL PORTFOLIO

EQUITIES

We believe the time is ripe for value-oriented investments following a decade of unusual underperformance, which we believe is now reversing. Within the more value-oriented sectors, we like the attractively valued energy sector, which is supported by high and rising energy prices. We also like equity markets that have a more value- and commodity-oriented tilt, such as the UK and Australia. For broad equity indexes, we still see upside toward year-end given high nominal GDP and positive earnings growth.

BONDS

Major central banks are poised to raise interest rates at an accelerated pace on the back of higher inflation. This has translated into higher interest rates across the yield curve, reflecting significant expectations of a meaningful and front-loaded rate hiking cycle, as well as wider spreads across credit markets. This in turn translates to better prospects ahead, as we think a lot is priced in for interest rate hikes and credit risks.

CURRENCIES

Commodity currencies like the Australian dollar, Norwegian krone, and Canadian dollar are our preferred currencies, while commodity importing, export-oriented, and low-yielding currencies like the euro should suffer. After a strong run for the US dollar on the back of rising expectations for Federal Reserve rate hike hikes, we think its appreciation potential is near its end. We remain cautious on the Chinese yuan.

TOPIC OF THE MONTH

A HAWKISH PIVOT

The Federal Reserve signaled its focus is on taming inflation without flagging the big economic costs this will entail. As long as this is the case and markets believe it, this might not be the basis for a sustained rebound in risk assets. If the Fed will consider the costs to growth at some point, especially if inflation cools, there might be a dovish pivot later this year. China’s slowdown is a large shock that will be felt over time.

The Fed stepped up its rhetoric last week by vowing to bring inflation down at any cost. but reality will be more complex. First, supply-driven inflation implies the sharpest policy trade-off in decades: between choking off growth via sharply higher rates or living with supply-driven inflation. Second, this trade-off is even more stark amid a weaker global macro outlook. The hit to Chinese growth is starting to rival its 2020 shock and already surpasses the one from the global financial crisis. See the chart. This will probably reduce growth in major economies and nudge up DM inflation at a very inopportune time when higher inflation is already proving more persistent.

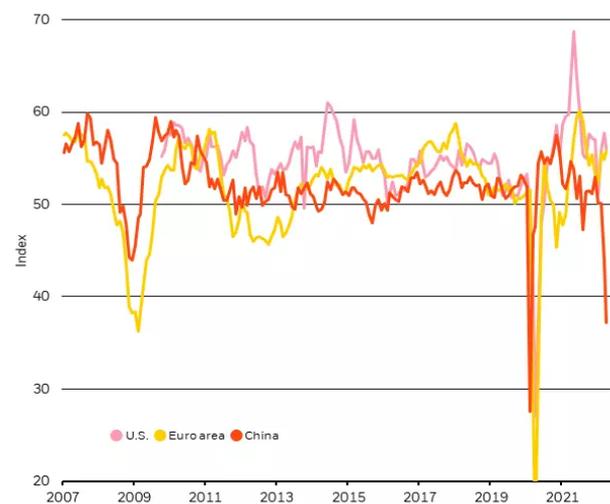

The Fed’s hawkish pivot this year has been stunning, and pronouncements on reining in inflation have become regular fare. Chair Jerome Powell just last week said the Fed would keep hiking rates until inflation is “tamed” – a comment that dismisses any trade-off or the lagged effect of monetary policy on the economy. The Fed now appears to be constraining itself to the hawkish side of policy options with such language, just as talking about the jump in inflation being “transitory” last year boxed it in when inflation proved more persistent and forced a sharp pivot. It might be that the Fed could be forced into another sharp pivot later this year, which we expect rather than a recession. These Fed pivots are driving market volatility.

Market expectations are now calling for the Fed funds rate to zoom up to a peak of 3.1% over the next year, more than doubling since the start of the year. For the European Central Bank, market pricing reflects four hikes this year and getting to nearly 1.4% next year, well above our estimate of neutral and for an economy at real risk of stagflation this year. The equity selloff this year makes sense from this perspective – if you believe that the market’s view of the Fed and ECB rate paths are right.

The growth reality will be more complex – both from the policy trade-off it faces amid a deteriorating macro backdrop, especially China’s slowdown and Europe facing stagflation. That’s why there might be a dovish pivot later in the year. We stick to our view of the Fed raising rates to around 2.5% by the end of this year – and then stopping to evaluate the effects. We still see the US economy’s momentum as strong – we expect growth of around 2.5% this year, slightly below consensus and far from recession. Equities may have short-term, technical rebounds.
